For Immediate Release – October 2007

No more “cash in hand”....

We all know there is no such thing as a free lunch but perhaps the days of paying for our latte and wrap with actual cash are nearly over?

Commonsense EPOS Ltd have been retained to install ‘Contactless’ payment readers into selected EAT Cafe sites throughout London.

The customer friendly and convenient contactless system is specifically designed for high volume, small transaction business. Customers spending less than £10 can pay for their goods by simply waving their enabled debit or credit card in front of a secure reader, in most cases without the need to key in their pin.

Bill Pratt, Technical Director of Commonsense Epos Ltd comments, “For everyday purchases, such as coffee, newspapers, sandwiches etc it seems cash may soon become a thing of the past. Contactless technology is spreading from specialized applications such as London’s Oyster Card out into the mass market - and the potential is huge”.

Guy Harvey, Finance Director of Eat Cafe comments, “By using contactless, our staff will need less time to cash up in the evenings because we will take fewer transactions during the day, it will also help eliminate some of the frustrations for our customers such as queues at our busiest times. We have worked with Commonsense very effectively for many years; consequently they were a natural partner for this exciting venture.’
